

FAMILIES NOW: WHAT WE DON'T KNOW IS HURTING US

*Judith T. Younger

Almost twenty years ago, the Hofstra Law Review published Marriage, Divorce, and the Family: A Cautionary Tale.¹ It was an adaptation of a speech I made as the Sidney and Walter Siben Distinguished Professorship Lecturer for 1992 to 93. The theme of the published piece was that marrying, divorcing, and having children, in or out of wedlock, was dangerous to women, leaving them at risk of poverty and financial dependence on government, men, or others.² The piece questioned the usefulness of scholarly debate or legal action to help matters and suggested that women themselves, armed with facts instead of myths, needed to take precautions to minimize the dangers of their own seemingly immutable acts.³ It nevertheless included a “wish list” of proposed legal reforms “to correct the wrong lessons” the law proclaimed and suggested that a massive advertising campaign waged through the media might be the most effective way to teach women what they needed to learn.⁴ I welcome the opportunity to revisit that ground.

On this revisit, I find some things unchanged. Women are still having babies in and out of wedlock. Scholarly debates in and out of academia and the law still have only minimal impact on family behavior. The examples I offer are Congress’s attempt to revamp the welfare system and the American Law Institute’s (“ALI”) attempt to convince courts and legislatures to revamp family law. Some things have changed.

Families are looking quite different from the heterosexual nuclear model, still in vogue in 1993 when I last visited the scene. Marriage has now taken the spotlight: gays want the status,⁵ while straights eschew it.⁶ There is evidence that some women have learned some advantageous things.⁷ I plan to describe the difficulties I have encountered in writing these comments, then move on to the new examples of the old phenomenon: the futility of trying to affect family behavior through scholarly endeavor or the law. From there, I will go to new phenomena, namely gay marriage and some women's newly acquired wisdom. Then I will conclude on a mildly optimistic note about women and family life. My starting point is, of course, 1993 when the speech first aired.

The logical way to begin the return visit, I thought, would be to present a current family demography. I wanted to produce a cohesive statistical picture showing the facts of American family life now, so that we could judge it against its counterpart of twenty years ago. I found the goal elusive. Studying official data, interpretations of that data by unofficial "fact tanks," media reports on both the data and the interpretations of the data, I soon realized that I would not be able to pin down "facts now."⁸ The data collectors do not deal in facts, nor do they deal with the present.⁹ Instead of facts, they bring forth samplings, approximations, estimates, and provisional information.¹⁰ They are either looking at the past¹¹ or guessing at the future.¹² Even deciding who is an official collector of what particular data is difficult,¹³ and so is resolving the clash among them.¹⁴ When one of them puts out two¹⁵ and even three¹⁶ conflicting assumptions or counts, the goal of forming a cohesive picture fails completely. Accordingly, what I offer here is the best statistical picture of today's American families that I have been able to muster. Fewer families are married: indeed "[m]arried couples represented just 48 percent of American households in 2010"¹⁷ Or was it fifty-one percent?¹⁸ More are merely cohabiting.¹⁹ The married

13. The CDC gave up collecting some of its vital family statistics in 1996, and the U.S. Census Bureau picked up the slack. See Marriages and Divorces, CENTERS FOR DISEASE CONTROL & PREVENTION, <http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/mardiv.htm> (last visited July 27, 2012) ("The collection of detailed data was suspended beginning in January 1996."). However, the Census Bureau sends researchers back to the CDC for certain family data. See Marriage and Divorce, U.S. CENSUS BUREAU, <http://www.census.gov/hhes/socdemo/marriage/> (last visited July 27, 2012).

14. Both the CDC and the Census Bureau publish the divorce rate, but they are quite different from each other. See Hughes, supra note 9; see also Paul R. Amato, Research on Divorce, Continuing Trends and New Developments, 72 J. MARRIAGE & FAM. 650, 650 (2010) (noting that several states do not report divorce information to the census, so there is not a "complete count of how many divorces occur in the United States annually"). For further discussion of this issue, see infra note 20 and accompanying text.

15. The Census Bureau, for example, learned only recently that about twenty-eight percent (approximately one in three) of unmarried women with babies that it has counted are, after all, living with a cohabiting partner. See Press Release, U.S. Census Bureau, Census Bureau Reports Nearly 1 in 3 Unmarried Women Who Give Birth Cohabit (Nov. 4, 2010), <http://www.census.gov/newsroom/releases/archives/fertility/cb10-167.html>. It only recently noticed this because it never asked before. See id. In addition, "[o]ne of the report's data sources, the Current Population Survey, recently added a direct question on cohabitation in order to measure this population." Id. From the new knowledge, the Census Bureau took a leap of faith to the assumption that the unmarried women are "not raising their children alone." See id. There is no question asking whether these women are indeed raising their children alone or together with their cohabitants or "pooling" their economic resources or keeping them separate. See id. For other purposes, when the Census Bureau defines poverty, for example, its traditional assumption has been that cohabitants are separate economic units. See Kathleen Short, U.S. CENSUS BUREAU, THE RESEARCH SUPPLEMENTAL POVERTY MEASURE: 2010, at 1-2 (2011). In the new supplemental definition of poverty, it takes the opposite view, assuming, as with cohabiting unmarried mothers, that cohabiting couples pool their funds and share expenses just as married couples do. See id. at 3. There are similarly conflicting definitions of poverty in use by the Census Bureau yielding quite different results. See id. at 3-4 (showing a nearly ten percent disparity in the poverty threshold between the official poverty threshold and the supplemental poverty measure).

couples are divorcing freely,²⁰ with one notable exception.²¹ The cohabiting couples are parting even more freely or eventually marrying.²² Fewer women are having fewer babies,²³ but more of those babies are born out of wedlock.²⁴ Some of these women are living with cohabitants and raising their children.²⁵ The number of single mother families is rising, and they are poorer than other families.²⁶ More gay people, married and not, are declaring themselves, and about one-fifth of them are raising children.²⁷ One might conclude that traditional marriage is becoming obsolete, and the American family is in crisis. Or one might conclude, instead, that cohabitation is the new marriage, that the American family is changing, but that everything is all right. The trouble with both headers and any other that we might pull out of the shaky demography is that they may be inaccurate descriptions of what is really happening in intimate relationships. My inability to form a better picture surprised me, and it gave rise to a caution that runs throughout these comments: the lack of reliable data.

The two most-talked-about points in my demography are the decline in the percentage of married people in the population and the rise in births out of wedlock. Neither of these is a new concern. Both were evident in 1993 and remarked on even then by the watchful Senator

Daniel P. Moynihan, writing his seminal article, Defining Deviancy Down, who was worried in 1993 about the breakdown of family structure and single parenthood.²⁸ He wrote:

the amount of deviant behavior in American society has increased beyond the levels the community can “afford to recognize” and . . . , accordingly, we have been re-defining deviancy so as to exempt much conduct previously stigmatized, and also raising the “normal” level in categories where behavior is now abnormal by any earlier standard.²⁹

Such sentiments, aimed at single mother families, poor and on welfare, swept the nation and gave rise, soon after Moynihan wrote this article, to so-called “welfare reform.”³⁰ The Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 (the “PRWORA”)³¹ was signed into law on August 22, 1996.³² This legislation was a product of hard negotiation between the Democratic President and the Republican Congress.³³ It attempted to revamp the system from “welfare” to “workfare.”³⁴ People on welfare needed an incentive to get off. The new law was supposed to give it by offering them a hand up rather than a handout.³⁵ It was a direct response to the sentiments voiced in the report Moynihan wrote in 1965 as Assistant U.S. Secretary of Labor.³⁶ That is evident from the Congressional findings incorporated into the first section of the PRWORA:

- (1) Marriage is the foundation of a successful society.
 - (2) Marriage is an essential institution of a successful society that promotes the interests of children.
 - (3) Promotion of responsible fatherhood and motherhood is integral to successful child rearing and the well-being of children.

(8) The negative consequences of an out-of-wedlock birth on the mother, the child, the family, and society are well documented

(10) Therefore, in light of this demonstration of the crisis in our Nation, it is the sense of the Congress that prevention of out-of-wedlock pregnancy and reduction in out-of-wedlock birth are very important Government interests and the policy contained in [this Act] is intended to address the crisis.³⁷

In a nutshell, Congress thought that the disadvantages of single motherhood fostered by the existing welfare system showed themselves in poor outcomes for children and justified congressional emphasis on discouraging births outside wedlock and encouraging marriage.³⁸ Welfare would no longer be an entitlement: cash benefits were made temporary and provisional.³⁹ Recipients were encouraged to marry and have children within marriage.⁴⁰ The Aid to Families with Dependent Children program (the “AFDC”), part of the Social Security Act since 1935, was eliminated and replaced by the more restrictive Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program (the “TANF”).⁴¹ The program was turned over to the states and those that achieved these goals were to get performance bonuses.⁴² Ironically, Senator Moynihan, who introduced his own version of proposed reform in the Senate, voted against the compromise bill.⁴³ He viewed it as an abandonment of dependent children, and an abandonment of those, who, like himself, believed that welfare reform could be effected without harming the people who needed it.⁴⁴

An assessment of the success of the reform depends on whom we ask, when we ask, and the criteria we use to measure success.⁴⁵ Here again there is no reliable data on which to base a conclusion.⁴⁶ Welfare rolls may move up or down, not necessarily with the law, but rather with the economy, going down during good economic times like those that followed the enactment of the PRWORA, and moving up in recessions.⁴⁷ There is no official follow-up on what happens to welfare recipients who use up their benefits and go off welfare.⁴⁸ One thing seems clear, at least: the PRWORA has not greatly affected familial behavior.⁴⁹ It has not succeeded in getting single mothers married,⁵⁰ nor has it stopped them from producing children.⁵¹ It has not placed mothers into jobs paying enough to keep their children in daycare while they work; they need to work in order to afford daycare and daycare in order to work.⁵² It has not shielded them from poverty during the recession.⁵³ However we rate the PRWORA, the policies underlying it are likely to be reversed if the current Democratic President and Congress survive the coming election.⁵⁴

Moving away from the political arena, we go next to the academy, where, not surprisingly, we find academics still talking and writing about family matters. Much of their effort centered (and continues to center) on the ALI's Principles of Dissolution (the "Principles").⁵⁵ The ALI describes itself as "the leading independent organization in the United States producing scholarly work to clarify, modernize, and otherwise improve the law."⁵⁶ Its membership consists of lawyers, judges, and law professors.⁵⁷ Thus, it is technically not a purely

“academic” organization, but most of its work is done by academics and is scholarly in nature.⁵⁸ Law professors are usually the so-called reporters or drafters of ALI projects, as they were for the Principles.⁵⁹ Members who attend meetings approve or reject their proposals.⁶⁰ Attendees typically represent only small segments of the membership and decide by voice vote.⁶¹ No records are kept of the number who voted “yes” or “no.”⁶² The Principles comprise 1187 pages,⁶³ and were over a decade in the making.⁶⁴ They take on the whole of family law⁶⁵ and are addressed to courts and legislatures.⁶⁶ They went through four successive drafts⁶⁷ and were adopted in 2000 and published in 2002.⁶⁸ Inevitably, they cover many of the same topics academics were talking about in 1993: the proper roles of fault and judicial discretion in deciding family matters, custodial responsibility for children, division of property on dissolution of marriage, and compensatory spousal payments (called “alimony” or “maintenance” by courts and legislatures), domestic partners, and marital agreements.⁶⁹

Many of the positions the Principles take are extremely controversial. They propose, for example, to treat heterosexual and homosexual couples as having been married when their stable, long-term relationships end.⁷⁰ They propose to abandon the almost universal “best interests of the child” standard in deciding custody disputes and to substitute a standard based on past caretaking practice.⁷¹ They would expand the class of people entitled to parental rights but not the traditional rules about who should be liable for children’s financial support.⁷² The Principles have certainly kept the academy busy,⁷³ and have generated a spate of media commentary and the expectation that they would influence their targeted audience.⁷⁴ However, according to a sophisticated and fascinating article by Michael R. Clisham and Robin Fretwell Wilson, American Law Institute’s Principles of the Law of Family Dissolution, Eight Years After Adoption: Guiding Principles or Obligatory Footnote?, the Principles’ influence on legislatures and courts, has been minimal.⁷⁵ “[E]arly returns suggest that the Principles are not having a significant positive influence on their intended audiences. It is likely, however, that the Principles will form the grist of academic pieces for years to come.”⁷⁶ Both propositions are still true four years later. So again we find a reiteration of an old conclusion: what academics talk about does not carry much weight in the nonacademic world.⁷⁷

Now we move to what is new since 1993. We have always had divergent families on the scene—that is, those not recognized by the law or out of favor with it—and, of course, we still do.⁷⁸ Same-sex couples have been among these disfavored groups, but they have made astonishing strides toward acceptance since 1993.⁷⁹ Then, Bowers v. Hardwick,⁸⁰ holding states could constitutionally proscribe private consensual intimate same-sex conduct, was seven years old.⁸¹ “Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell” (“DADT”),⁸² the federal law mandating the discharge of any U.S. armed service member who was openly lesbian, gay, or bisexual, was newly minted.⁸³ It became official U.S. policy in American military forces in December 1993.⁸⁴ Bowers has been overruled,⁸⁵ DADT is now ended,⁸⁶ and the 2010 Census was the first to report the numbers of same-sex couples who describe themselves as married (that is, those who used the terms husband and wife to describe their relationship).⁸⁷ Six states allow same-sex couples to marry.⁸⁸

Some would say that the law, through judicial decision and legislation, is accomplishing the cultural shift in attitudes about gay families.⁸⁹ Others would attribute it to the mass media, more specifically to television programs like Will and Grace and Ellen.⁹⁰ The former was a sitcom that ran for eight seasons from 1998 to 2006.⁹¹ It featured apartment mates, Will, a gay male lawyer, played by Eric McCormack, and Grace, a straight female interior designer, played by Deborah Messing.⁹² The Ellen show ran for four seasons from 1994 to 1998.⁹³ It featured Ellen Morgan, a neurotic lesbian bookstore owner, played by Ellen DeGeneres.⁹⁴ Ellen DeGeneres came out on the Oprah Winfrey Show in 1997.⁹⁵ Ellen Morgan came out later in the year during the Ellen show, doubling the impact.⁹⁶ What these characters did for same-sex acceptance, Candice Bergen, as Murphy Brown, in the television show of the same name, had done for acceptance of single motherhood when she became an unwed mother during the 1992 presidential campaign.⁹⁷ As Dahlia Lithwick describes the effect in The New Yorker Magazine: “A mainstream television comedy featuring openly gay characters demonstrated what social scientists have long known: the single most important indicator of one’s support for gay rights is whether one knows someone who is gay. In a pinch, it seems, a fellow [or a gal] on TV will do.”⁹⁸

For those who prefer to see the law as the instrument of change, we could say the first real legal impetus came from Romer v. Evans,⁹⁹ in which the U.S. Supreme Court, in 1996, held that a Colorado ordinance that discriminated against gay persons violated the Equal Protection Clause of the U.S. Constitution.¹⁰⁰ Less than a month after that decision both houses of Congress by large majorities passed the Defense of Marriage Act (“DOMA”),¹⁰¹ defining marriage as a union between one man and one woman for all federal purposes and purporting to relieve states from recognizing any such union though recognized by another state.¹⁰²

President Clinton signed DOMA on September 21, 1996.¹⁰³ States followed through with similar legislation and constitutional amendments—so-called “little DOMAs”—of their own.¹⁰⁴ There, gay marriage stalled until the Court decided *Lawrence v. Texas*¹⁰⁵ in 2003. In it, the Court overruled the seventeen-year-old decision in Bowers.¹⁰⁶ Changing its mind in Lawrence, the Court held, as a matter of substantive due process that a state could not, consistently with the U.S. Constitution, prohibit same-sex consensual conduct in private places.¹⁰⁷ The Court thus “decriminalized” gay Americans.¹⁰⁸

Just the next year, the Massachusetts Supreme Court, in a four to three decision, held that confining marriage to one man and one woman violated the Massachusetts Constitution.¹⁰⁹ That state thus became the first to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples.¹¹⁰ As of this writing, there are six jurisdictions in the United States where same-sex couples can marry.¹¹¹ The rest do not afford such protection, though five states do provide civil unions.¹¹² Alongside those jurisdictions that allow same-sex couples to marry, the majority of states retain their little DOMAs.¹¹³ The federal prohibition still lies on the books but President Obama has instructed the Justice Department not to enforce it.¹¹⁴ This situation has served to make counting gays, married and not, very difficult for the Census Bureau,¹¹⁵ and may explain why it has provided no fewer than three counts of them side-by-side.¹¹⁶ I think there is a great deal of potential societal good to be harvested here. If the demographic picture shows truly that marriage is in danger of becoming obsolete, we ought to welcome this group that is ready and waiting to help shore it up. As gays marry and form stable families, they may lead the way to “saving” heterosexual marriage as well.¹¹⁷

Our demographic picture shows us that women continue to engage in the old dangerous conduct: marrying, divorcing, and having children in and out of wedlock. Some are modifying their behavior.¹¹⁸ First, more women are deciding not to have children at all; childlessness by choice may be becoming a more acceptable lifestyle.¹¹⁹ Second, while “motherhood without marriage” becomes more and more “normal,” there is one group of women that still “largely resists the trend: college graduates who overwhelmingly marry before having children,” and stay married.¹²⁰

In the affluent neighborhoods where many college-educated Americans live, marriage is alive and well and stable families are the rule. Young Americans with college degrees, once thought to be a cultural vanguard, are creating a neotraditional style of family life: although they may cohabit with their partners, nearly all of them marry before having their first child. Furthermore, while most wives work outside the home, the divorce rate in this group has declined to levels not seen since the early 1970s.¹²¹

Education is good for women: that was my earlier message.¹²² It is heartening to see some women heeding it, and younger women among them.¹²³

The more things change, however, the more they stay the same. So it is that we find women engaging in new types of dangerous conduct.¹²⁴ They are using assisted reproductive technology (“ART”) to help not only themselves, but other women and gay men to have babies.¹²⁵ They are engaged in egg retrieval, in vitro fertilization, embryo transfer, and serving as gestational or genetic surrogates for others.¹²⁶ This is brave, and when done for someone else, altruistic and not very well paid.¹²⁷ Whomever the procedure is done for, it is risky behavior.¹²⁸ At the least we could hope to keep careful watch on the women going into these activities and the babies coming out of them, monitoring their numbers and health. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (“CDC”) provides some information, for example:

Recent research by the Centers for Disease Control showed that ART babies are two to four times more likely to have certain kinds of birth defects. These may include heart and digestive system problems, and cleft (divided into two pieces) lips or palate. Researchers don’t know why this happens. The birth defects may not be due to the technology. Other factors, like the age of the parents, may be involved. More research is needed. The risk is relatively low, but parents should consider this when making the decision to use ART.¹²⁹

The CDC does not do any of its own counting or monitoring but is dependent on fertility clinics and other agencies like the American Society for Reproductive Technology (“SART”) to report to it.¹³⁰ They, of course, are not mere observers; they are deeply interested.¹³¹ SART, according to its website is “the primary organization of professionals dedicated to the practice of assisted reproductive technologies (ART) in the United States.”¹³² Both SART and the CDC seem most interested in “success rates,”¹³³ as is Congress.¹³⁴ This is not much of a record on which to formulate a sound national policy or educate those most directly involved.

I still believe that education is the key to protecting women from the dangerous things they do. There is a glaring need for reliable data to enable them to learn the right lessons. Perhaps in the next twenty years we will have collected it and their educations will be complete.
